

Long-Term Support Training 2006

Sponsored by the Bureau of Long-Term Support

NEW ON-LINE TRAINING AVAILABLE:

Identifying Individual Outcomes: An Introduction to Outcome-Based Care Planning

Wisconsin's community-based long-term care programs strive to individualize supports and services for program participants. Individual outcomes are the real-life results people want their long-term care services and supports to help them achieve. Wisconsin's publicly-funded long-term care programs are incorporating person-centered, outcome-based care planning as the basic approach to providing effective long-term care services. Outcome-based care planning goes beyond identifying assessed needs to integrating the real life results people want to achieve in comprehensive plans that reflect the individual's priorities and preferences.

This training is intended to provide you with a basic understanding of 'individual outcomes' and outcome-based care planning. After completing this training, you will have a better understanding of:

- What individual outcomes are and are not.
- How to identify individual outcomes.
- How to develop care plans that support individual outcomes.

A variety of tools and resources are available through the training to guide you through the process of identifying individual outcomes.

The Department of Health and Family Services/Bureau of Long-Term Support (BLTS) offers on-line training through a partnership with the University of Wisconsin-Madison School of Social Work and School of Nursing. Through this partnership, high-quality and cost-effective training is available to meet your continuing education needs and support best practice in working with Wisconsin's long-term care programs. Continuing Education Units/Hours are provided upon completion of the training. These trainings are available on an on-going basis and can be accessed at your convenience.
